The defence review day

FOR PROGRAMME TEAMS, PRIMES AND SUPPLIERS

Whether you set the requirement, integrate the system or build the equipment, you want capability that works where it is used, delivered at pace and affordable through its life. With time and money tight on every side, the questions that matter most often sit between teams and organisations.

Who it suits

A supplier new to defence
You have equipment or expertise defence could use, and you are learning fast how defence buys and works while still running the business. The day shows what a prime or programme team will look for, and what to put in place first.

A supplier joining a prime's programme
Your equipment has to work with everyone else's and be supported for years. The day looks at what integration, trials evidence, spares and support will ask of you, while the design and plan can still change.

A programme or prime team
You would value an independent view, from the operator's side, of requirements, integration, interoperability and through-life support, on one question, before money is committed or a design is fixed.

What happens, and when

1. The free conversation. If a review day isn't the right help, Brad will say so.
2. Agree the question. A short written scope: the question, who should take part, and the papers worth reading beforehand. Only what you are able to share.
3. The day, usually within three weeks. Brad works through the question with whoever you choose to involve, from engineering and trials to support and commercial.
4. Within a week, the written priorities and actions.
5. You decide what next. Take the actions forward yourselves, or ask for help, agreed separately.

What you keep

- A short written report: the question, what was looked at, and what was found.
- The priorities in order, with the reasoning, so you can explain them to colleagues and customers.
- Practical actions, each with a suggested owner.
- Assumptions and gaps stated plainly, including where your own specialists or independent testing are still needed.

Confidential from the first conversation. Brad is happy to sign a non-disclosure agreement. For days in person, travel and accommodation are agreed beforehand and charged at cost.

Who you would be working with

Brad Wright CEng has been trusted to deliver some of the nation's most critical programmes, in fast-paced, highly regulated organisations where time and resources are always tight. He has seen defence from every side: at sea on operations as a Royal Navy weapon engineer officer; as a buyer at the Defence Procurement Agency (now part of DE&S), taking anti-submarine warfare systems from concept into service; and as a supplier's director, preparing Interserve's 99 defence sites for a £980m re-bid and leading accounts including Dstl at EMCOR. Beyond defence he has led £384m of London 2012 security projects, critical national infrastructure and global subsea engineering, and spent three decades as a consultant, interim director and adviser.

Why that matters to you. Your team may already include former senior officers or consultants. Brad brings the operator's, the buyer's and the supplier's view together in one person, with a director's experience of delivering the result himself. He works alongside your people, closes the gaps between their disciplines and leaves the plan with them.
